

“In learning of the burning of the Capitol and the loss of the 3,000-volume Library of Congress in 1814, Thomas Jefferson offered Congress his personal library as a replacement. A second fire in 1851 destroyed two thirds of those volumes,” said Mark Dimunation, Library of Congress chief of Rare Book and Special Collections Division. “One book that survived both fires is Thomas Jefferson’s original copy of The Wealth of Nations.”
